The M.A. program in Communication at Boise State University provides the opportunity to pursue rigorous study of human communication to understand, critique, and actively engage contemporary interpersonal, organizational, cultural, social, and media-related issues. With a focus on the theory and practice of communication, the program seeks to develop engaged scholars, critical thinkers, and leaders using communicative perspectives to address issues across a variety of contexts.

Graduate student coursework, in combination with the development of individual thesis projects, offers students an opportunity to develop expertise in relational and organizational communication, critical/cultural studies, and media studies. Our faculty work closely with graduate students to support their studies. With the guidance of a graduate faculty advisor and thesis committee, students develop a plan of study that supports their unique academic interests within the diverse field of communication.

Developing Engaged Scholars
Graduate students receive individual mentoring from faculty. Graduate advisors support student development in scholarship, independent research, and writing. Some of our graduates continue their education at top Ph.D. programs across the country.

Promoting Critical Thinking
Graduate students explore the ways communication shapes how we come to understand and engage our everyday world. With focused attention to issues of power, difference, and politics, graduate students learn to challenge taken-for-granted ways of knowing and critically examine the complexities of communication, social interaction, and media.

Becoming Active Leaders
Graduate students become leaders applying their understanding of communication to address a variety of contemporary issues. We encourage students to gain expertise in specific areas of communication to guide their professional interests, career goals, or life aspirations. Our graduates become leaders in a wide range of government, non-profit, corporate, and media-related fields.

Applications are due by February 15th
Apply today
graduatecollege.boisestate.edu/howtoapply

For more information communication.boisestate.edu/graduate

Questions?
If you have any questions about the program, the application process, or if you wish to learn more about how an M.A. in Communication might align with your interests, please contact our director of graduate studies:

Dr. John McClellan
commasters@boisestate.edu